

TWO IMPORTANT THANKSGIVING DAY BOUTS.

AND OTHER FISTIC FACTS, BY TOM ANDREWS

While all eyes are turned toward Los Angeles, for the Thanksgiving day battle between Wolgast and Welsh it might be well to keep in mind another bout which although not so important, may have a bearing on the lightweight title in the future.

The contest will be between Grover Hayes and Joe Mandot, who gained fame by whipping Milburn Saylor. Mandot and Hayes should put up a grand fight and the winner will be in line for the Welsh-Wolgast bout.

Eddie McGoorty, Wisconsin middleweight, may be in England again this winter, as his manager, Patsy Callahan, has received an invitation to box Jim Sullivan at the National Sporting club.

If the match is closed Eddie may go over after the holidays.

Mike (Twin) Sullivan, former champion welterweight, who outgrew the class, and who has been having a touch of the quiet life on a farm near Cambridge, Mass., will forsake the cows and chicken and try his luck in the arena again.

Mike is to meet Paddy Lavin at Buffalo, Nov. 28, and if he wants he will go after the harder nuts in the 150-pound division and the middleweight class. If Mike is right he is hard to beat.

Al Delmont, who has fought Jimmy Walsh about as often as Jim Barry has mixed with Sam

Langford, wants to get the bantamweight belt and has challenged Johnny Coulon at 116 pounds.

Albert is a great little fighter, but he will not be able to make 116 pounds ringside and Johnny Coulon absolutely refuses to make a lower weight for any star.

Danny McKetrick, clever manager of Joe Jeanette, claims the world's championship, basing his stand on the statement of Jack Johnson that he is through with the ring.

Joe should share the honor with Langford and McVey, with Johnson out of the way, but the champion has not retired and the chances are he will be seen in action again before another six months passes.

In the meantime it might be well for Jeanette to settle the question of supremacy with Langford and McVey.

IN THE LIMELIGHT

Among the many pretty debutantes the Pacific coast has permitted to blossom in Washington society, none has been any prettier or more graceful than the daughter of the senior senator from Oregon, Miss Carrie Lee Chamberlain, who will make her bow to the younger congressional set in December.
